Aids Physical Wellbeing and Lessons
Desire for Meat, Says Professor.
New Haven, Oct. 6.—Prof. Irving Fisher, professor of political economy at Yale, has been conducting experiments to discover whether proper mastication and enjoyment of food would affect the working powers of the individual, and announcement is just made of some of the results obtained.

"These experiments were, with Miss Yale students," Prof. Fisher says, "They began in January and lasted 4½ months."

"At the middle of the experiment the men had improved 30 per cent in endurance. The second half showed as marked improvement as the first, and at the end of the period the men were able to do double the amount of physical work, as shown by gymnasium tests, that they were capable of in January."

"Meals were available three times a day, but it was found that by thorough mastication the men gradually lost their desire for meat and substituted cereals, fruits and nuts, so that at the end of the first half of the experiment their final consumption of meat was little more than half of its original amount."
